Note 7 The ecclesiastical use of L. persona does not appear before the 12th c. It was app. still new at the Council of Clermont 1096, when it was said, c. iii 'Ecclesie vel decimarum... æpiscopis ab Episcopis sub palliata avaritia venduntur mortuum, munitum, sex mutatis Clericis, quos Personas vocant' (Mansi Concilia XX, 602) Various views have been taken of its genesis. English legal writers, Coke, Blackstone, etc., have referred it to the Civil Law sense of persona, the parson being viewed as the legal 'person' by whom the property of God, the Patron Saint, or the church, in the parish, was actually held, the person to use and be sued in respect of this property. Du Cange (ed. 1762), pointing to the nearly equivalent use of persona and dignitas, would derive it from the sense 'personage, great or dignified person, dignitary' (Schaefer, Flurherrschaft und Stift zum Deutschen Nationalstift). It was originally applied to the holder of a parish, a parochial living who was non-resident, being either a conventual body, a chapter, or member of one, or often a mere layman, the spiritual duties being in either case discharged by a vicarius or substitute, who received a small portion of the revenues. He refers the designation to the fact that the holder of the living merely figured in the character or rôle (cf. L. persona) of parish clergyman, without actually discharging the duties. He explains the frequent early equivalence of persona and dignitas, adduced by Du Cange, in the case of conventual or collegiate rectors, by the usual application of dignitas to the superior personages or 'dignitaries' of a chapter, and the fact that it was by these that the parochial parsonages were held. It would appear however that in England the appellation must have been early interpreted in the Civil Law sense, else how should it have been extended from the persona immortalis to the persona mortalis or resident rector, and have become in England his legal designation?]

The form with h was app. the earlier, being that first adopted in Western languages see BASHAW.]

In Turkish there is no hard-and-fast line between the breath and voice stops; and in the case of p, b, the confusion is increased by the absence of p in Arabic and the occasional replacement of Persian and Turkish p by b (cf. papoush, pabouch, babouche, etc.): this may have been conducted to interchange of b, p, and survival of the p in pasha. Some however think pāshā and bāshā originally distinct words (cf. quot 1687), Zenker distinguishes bāshā, the officer of the janizaries, from pāshā, which is now largely a civil title; but Barbier says that the title, in either form, was under the ancient régime exclusively a military one. The best Turkish scholars think there is no ground for connecting the word in any way with Pers. pādshāh king or emperor, Turkish pādshāh the Sultan.]

A title borne in Turkey by officers of high rank, as military commanders, and governors of provinces. Formerly, esp. in the case of military commanders, written BASHAW.

There are three grades of pashas, formerly distinguished by the number of horse-tails displayed as a symbol in war, the highest grade (of three tails) corresponding to a commanding general, admiral, or governor of equivalent rank, the second (of two tails) to a general of division or vice-admiral, etc., the third (of one tail) to a general of brigade, rear-admiral, or naval officer of corresponding rank.

Pasigraphy (pās'grāfī). [irreg. f Gr πᾶσι for all + -GRAPHY.] A name given to a system of writing proposed for universal use, with characters representing ideas instead of words, so as to be (like the ordinary numerals 1, 2, 3, etc.) intelligible to persons of all languages. Applied originally to a system proposed in 1796; subsequently to others having a similar object.

Pasquin (pæ'skwīn), sb. [ult. ad. It. Pasquino, in L. Pasquinus, F. Pasquin.]

Pasquino or Pasquillo was the name popularly given to a mutilated statue, or piece of ancient statuary, disinterred at Rome in the year 1501, and set up by Cardinal Caraffa at the corner of his palace near the Piazza Navona. Under his patronage, it became the annual custom on St Mark's Day to 'restore' temporarily and dress up this torso to represent some historical or mythological personage of antiquity; on which occasion professors and students of the newly restored Ancient Learning were wont to salute Pasquin in Latin verses which were usually posted or placed on the statue. In process of time these pasquinade or pasquinades tended to become satirical, and the term began to be applied, not only in Rome, but in other countries, to satirical compositions and lampoons, political, ecclesiastical, or personal, the anonymous authors of which often sheltered themselves under the conventional name of Pasquin. According to Mazzocchi, in the preface to the printed collection of the pasquinade of 1509, the name Pasquino or Pasquillo originated in that of a schoolmaster ('litterator seu magister ludus') who lived opposite the spot where the statue was found; a later tradition given by Castelvetro, 1558-9, made Pasquino a caustic tailor or shoemaker, another of 1544 calls him a barber. See L. Morandi in Nuova Antologia 1889 L. 271; 755; D. Gnoli ibid. 1890 I 57, 275, Storia di Pasquino. The latinized form Pasquillus was already a 1544 applied both to the author and the pasquinade, in which extended application it was subseq. followed also by Pasquin].

L. in Du Cange, with derivs. of 11th c.), f. pass-us step, pace, track (Pass sb. 1). The primary signification was thus 'to step, pace, walk', but already in 11th c. OF. it had come to denote progression or moving on from place to place. Pass and pace are the same word, the forms having been in later times differentiated, and pace restricted to those senses which are akin to or derived from PAUSE sb., while pass has been retained for the other original senses and the newer ones developed from them.]

In Eng. pass has become the most general verb expressing onward motion, passing may consist in going, running, riding, flying, swimming, sailing, floating, gliding, or in being carried, drawn, driven, impelled, or moved on, in any way. In many cases the intrans. sense can be expressed by go, especially when construed with, or extended by, prepositions or adverbs expressing varieties of direction, etc., but it can be used in many transitive senses in which go is inapplicable, e.g. to pass into a new state or condition, or to a new subject. It differs from move in expressing the effect rather than the action. Without any prepositional or adverbial extension, the original and intrans. use is now chiefly confined to branches V and VI, being otherwise less frequent than the derived trans and causal uses in B and C.

As in other intrans. vbs of motion (go, come, depart, etc.), the perfect of resultant condition has originally the auxiliary be (he is passed, they were passed) cf. sense 1, quots c1380, 1 b, 14, 2, c1400, etc. This was sometimes retained even when pass was transitive cf. sense 34, quots 1375, 38, quots 14, 1526, etc. Hence arose the later Pass prep, q. v.

b. In recent use applied by some to the fifth week of Lent, beginning with Passion Sunday.

This appears to have originated in the adoption of the continental name Holy Week (sestimana santa, semaine sainte) for the week of the Passion, and the consequent tendency to differentiate the English name Passion Week, and associate it with Passion Sunday.

1854 Hook Ch. Dict. s. v. Some persons call the week, of which Passion Sunday is the first day, Passion Week, and the real Passion Week they call Holy Week. This is, however, a piece of pedantry, founded on a mistake. 1891 [see PASSION TIDE]

WGer. pap has naturally been compared with Gk. πάρος 'trodden or beaten way', and with Zend pāp (pāpan, pāpan) 'way'; but to these it could be related only as a borrowed term, which with a word of such a sense is most unlikely. On the other hand, the occurrence of original initial p in Teutonic is uncertain; if this is, an example, pap would correspond to pre-Teut. bat, which has suggested the root of L. battire to beat.]

L. patronus had the senses of protector and defender of his clients (viz. of individuals, of cities, or provinces), also, the former master of a freedman or freedwoman, an advocate or defender before a court of justice, or, generally, of any person or cause. In med. L. and Romanic it acquired the senses of patron saint, patron or advowee (advocatus) of a church, and that of lord or master, in many specific connexions, also that of exemplar, pattern. Most of these senses are represented in Eng. patron, but the order in which they were taken into Eng. does not correspond to that of their appearance in Latin and Romanic, sense 4, 'patron of a church', being the earliest to be adopted. The order here followed is one of convenience; the chronological order may be seen from the quotations. The sense PATERN is now differentiated in spelling, and is treated as a distinct word.]

1. The name of the hilly district in the north-west of Derbyshire, England; divided into the High Peak and the Low or Lower Peak, approximately corresponding to the modern Hundreds of High Peak and Wirksworth respectively.

In 12-13th c. the word seems to have been apprehended as the proper name of the Castle Hill at Castleton, under which is the Peak Cavern. The post-Conquest use of Peak in the sense of OE Placdon seems to have arisen through the application of the name of Peverel's castle to the district thence governed. The Ordnance Map, without any warrant in local usage, gives the name 'The Peak' to an elevated plateau or mountain mass in the High Peak Hundred (see quot. 1874), in which it is followed by geography books, etc. 1240 O. Peak (pīk), sb. 2 Forms 6 pek, peke, 6-7 peake, 8 peek, 7- peak. [Known from 16th c. as a later equivalent of PIKE sb 1; in 15th c. the deriv. peked, PEAKED, appears as an equivalent of PIKED. The phonetic relations are difficult to understand; but cf. MLG. pēk, peik, 'pick, pike, pointed iron instrument' It is notable that in sense 1, peak is identical with beak. (Ir. peac is from Eng.).

The connexion between PIKE sb 1 and peak appears in the ads piked, peaked. From pike, the long point of a 14th c. shoe, instanced in Wyclif c. 1380, we have piked schone in Langland P. Pl, 1377 These appear c. 1450-60 as pekyd, peked schone, being the first appearance of the peke, peak-form. Peak itself is exemplified in Palsgr, 1530. In the 16th c. the forms pīke and peak appear to have gone apart in sense, pīke being confined more to a sharp piercing or pricking point (perhaps under the influence of PIKE sb 3, the weapon, introduced early in that century), while peak is more associated with the notion of a projecting point, not specially sharp or acuminate. Peak as a pointed mountain-top, or conical mountain (sense 5) is a still later (17th c.) substitution for an earlier pīke].

Pearl (pāl), sb.⁴ [app. another form of PURL, q. v.] One of a row of fine loops forming a decorative edging on pillow-lace, braid, ribbon, gold-lace, etc. Chiefly in Comb., as pearl-edge, -loop, -purrl, -tie: see QUOTS.

The oldest spelling seems to be PURL, app. connected with PURL v., but whilst this has become established technically in the machine made lace trade, popular etymology seems to favour the spelling pearl, prob. because the ornamental loops somewhat resemble an edging of pearl-drops.

(Note. Peat has from the beginning been applied in the north, not to the substance, but to a shaped and prepared piece of it (cf. the expressions 'to make peats', 'peat-making'), the suggestion is offered that we may have in it one of several instances in which a word or meaning 'pieces' has become at length the term for a piece of some particular substance. If this be so, there may be etymological connexion with the stem petite which gave med. L. petra, petra (= petra), petra, petra, petra, petra, and is held to be of Celtic origin (Thurneysen Keltos. oman 20). The Old Celtic entries in the Book of Deer, have pet, genit. pette, in sense 'portion, piece', with which Stokes, Goidelic (ed. 2) 120, compares O.I. pet portion of food (in terc. fit. leth. fit). (This word is supposed to have passed into Goidelic from a Brythonic dialect of Welsh pet portion.))

Godefroy's OF. instance refers to oats for horses, which was also a chief use of pek in ME. In this, 16th cent. pek was synonymous with F. picotin 'a pecke or the fourth part of a boisseau', used only in the measuring of oats' (Cottgr.), a horse's feed of oats (Scheler); in med. L. picotinus 'but the latter was evidently a deriv. of med. L. picotus, -ta a liquid measure, in OF. picote a wine-measure (14th c. in Godef.). The radical part of these words may be cognate with pek. The formal resemblances of picote to F. picoter, 'to prick often, to peck as a bird', and of pek, peck to pek, pekke, PRCK v., is notable; but pek sb. is known long before the vb., and cannot easily be derived from it.]

Pectic (pektik), a. Chem. [ad. Gr. πηκτικ-ός, f. πηκτ-ός congealed, curdled, f. stem πηγ- of πηγνύειν to make firm or solid.] In pectic acid, a transparent gelatinous substance formed by chemical action from PECTIN, and forming an important constituent of fruit-jellies.

(By further transformation it is converted into parapectic acid (PARA- 2 a) and metapectic acid.) Pectic fermentation, the fermentation supposed to be produced by PECTINASE, which converts pectin into pectic and other related acids.

1831 T. THOMSON Chem. Inorg. Bodies (ed. 7) II. 120 Braconnot gave it the name of pectic acid, from the great tendency which it has to form a jelly with water. 1863 MITCHELL Farm. of Edgewood 225 Pears have a modicum of pectic acid at a certain stage of their ripeness. 1866-77 WATTS Dict. Chem. IV. 365 Under the influence of acids or alkalis, pectin is gradually modified, and ultimately transformed into a strongly acid compound called metapectic acid, passing however through a series of intermediate modifications called by Frémy parapectin, metapectin, pectosic acid, pectic acid, and parapectic acid 1893 *Syd. Pectin (pektin). Chem. [f. stem pect- of PECTIO + -IN 1.] A white neutral substance, soluble in water, formed from PECTOSE by heating with acids, or naturally in the ripening of fruits, and constituting the gelatinizing agent in vegetable juices; in the further process of ripening, it is converted into parapectin (PARA- 2 a), metapectin, and other related substances (see PECTIO).

1838 T. THOMSON Chem. Inorg. Bodies 146 Vauquelin, who found pectin in the tamarind, considered it as the same with pectic acid. 1866-77 WATTS Dict. Chem. IV. 364 Green fruits... do not contain pectin ready formed, but only pectose. . . When the fruit is ripe, the juice... contains a large quantity of pectin, and still more of parapectin. . . Lastly, fruits in the over-ripe state no longer contain a trace of pectin, that substance having been converted into metapectic acid.

[Note. Pediment, in Evelyn pediment, in Randle Holme pediment, has the appearance of a derivative in -ment, of L. pēs, ped- 'foot'. But L. pedimentum was a 'vine-stake' or 'prop', it pedamentum 'any foundation, ground-work, base, or footing' (Florio) senses with which the modern 'pediment' has no connexion. Evelyn's word was evidently an attempted improvement upon the workmen's perment or permentum, which the translator of Hyphorotomachia considered to be 'corrupt English' for perimeter. But the corruption of perimeter to perment is difficult to imagine, and the connexion of sense (see Willis Archit. Nomencl. Midd. Ages 37 note) is far-fetched, and it seems more likely that perment was a workman's corruption of pyramis, which a triangular gable sometimes resembles in section, and which is actually pronounced perment, or pyramment by the illiterate in some districts of England (e.g. in West Somerset) at the present day. This would also better explain 'the perment of the Countess' in 1602-2 above, since the fountain in question had no 'pediment', but a curved roof in form of an ogre cupola. If this is the derivation, we have the series pyramis, perment, permentum, peda-, pede-, pedimentum.)

4. The general name, in modern writers, for the small towers or fortified dwellings built in the 16th c. in the border counties of England and Scotland, for defence against hostile forays; consisting of a massive square edifice, the ground-floor of which was vaulted, and used as a shelter or refuge for cattle, while the upper part (the access to which was by a door on the level of the first floor, with external ladder or movable stair) was the abode of the owner and his family.

(In this sense, probably orig. short for peel-house (see 6), i. e. house defended by a peel (in sense 2). But the name is now applied in many cases in which it has no historical support.) It is evidently akin to sense 3.
